The receiving ward was opposite our – where we worked so what happened was that we used to see them come in and go – they went to the receiving ward and then if they had any – anything of value in them they put them – they got a box over there. Then they brought them over to us and then we had to make a record of, you know. At those times, you could only visit the hospital between two and four and so, you know, the relatives, if they were any, you know, sort of watches or – or anything, you know, they come in and between two and four in the afternoon. Yes, this – this bit – the pilot waved at the children and then killed thirty-eight of them. Well, you know. You've heard about this? I expect you've heard about this. Well, the children came in and we didn't have enough beds and they were, you know, in the corridors and so on and they were a bit short on the wards. I remember, I had to help one of the doctors, you know with one of the lamps, go around with him. And otherwise we didn't actually go on the wards.
